The Indian community in South Africa had its origins in one of the world's great migrations. Between 1860 and 1911 some 160,000 Indians were transported by ship from India to Natal in South Africa to work as indentured labourers in the sugar plantations. The first ship to arrive, on 16 November 1860, was the SS Truro, a steam-assisted sailing ship, carrying 344 labourers including some women and children. Altogether there were 384 such voyages in many different ships over a period of more than 50 years. The terms of the indenture were such that the labourer could return to India after 10 years (later 5 years) but most chose to remain. Their descendants number about 1.3 million people or 2.5% of the country's inhabitants.

The colonial administration documented each arrival and these records have been computerised and can be viewed at: <http://scnc.ukzn.ac.za/doc/SHIP/shipndx.html>. The author of the website here wrote the initial version of the data capture software in the 1980s.
